Should a lawsuit rain down, do you have your umbrella?

Lawsuits happen every day. Some are frivolous, while others warrant merit. If you were sued, would you have enough money to cover your attorney's fees and possible settlements? Most homeowners and automobile policies offer certain protections to cover legal liability, but is it enough?

If you are concerned about your ability to cover all the possible expenses of a lawsuit, you should consider purchasing an umbrella policy. This insurance policy will cover you if you cause bodily injury, property damage or personal injury to another party. Since umbrella policies are accessed only after the liability coverage from your homeowners or automobile policies are exceeded, umbrella policies usually are inexpensive. A million-dollar or larger policy costs between $200-300 per year.

Umbrella policies also offer protections that traditional homeowners or auto policies do not cover. Typically, there are two umbrella coverages: personal liability and defense. Personal liability covers more than bodily injury (e.g., damages caused by slander, libel, defamation, detention, confinement and related allegations and more). Defense will pay to defend claims or lawsuits for damages based on personal injury or property damage (e.g., expenses incurred in defense, premiums on bonds required in the lawsuit, reimbursement for lost earning and more).

While an umbrella policy offers additional protection, there are situations that are not covered. For example, if you own a business, only a business insurance policy covers against liability claims. Most umbrella policies do not cover punitive damages. Additionally, some umbrella policies are eligible only to policyholders who have both their homeowners and auto insurance policies through the same insurance company.

Thinking about Airbnb? Consider the implications

Millions of people use house/apartment share services like Airbnb, every year. These services match hosts who are looking to rent their dwelling or room for a short period of time with guests. The majority of the matches made by these services are reportedly matches made in heaven. Of course, this isn't always the case. Accidents do happen with guests getting injured at the host's home. There also is no shortage of stories about hosts discovering their homes destroyed, filled with naked people or with drug paraphernalia strewn about. What happens if a guest is injured on your property or you come home to a nasty scene?

If you were to use Airbnb, the company provides Host Protection Insurance with protection up to $1 million in the event the host is legally liable for someone's bodily injury or property damage. This is excess insurance, meaning it pays after the homeowners liability insurance limit is exhausted, if this coverage is available. In addition, the Airbnb Host Guarantee will reimburse the host up to $1 million in damage to the host's eligible property if a resolution cannot be achieved with the guest responsible for the damage.

How likely is it that your homeowners or renters policy will respond? This can be difficult to determine without assistance from a professional. Property coverage is dependent on the type of property, the location of that property and the circumstances of the guest's occupancy. Liability coverage is dependent on what part of the home is rented, how often the home is rented, and how many people are involved.

Further, if you fail to disclose that you are using your property for a commercial purpose, you could run the risk of having your insurance policy canceled. Many states allow insurance companies to cancel homeowners or renters policies at any time if the carrier discovers that the insured withheld a material fact about the property, such as the insured using the property for commercial purposes.

In addition to the insurance implications, renting your dwelling for short periods of time might be illegal in your area. Many municipalities prohibit the renting out of a home or apartment for short periods of time. So, before you decide to participate in home-share services, check your policy and your municipal laws, or you might be checking your couch cushions for spare change to pay off the claims made against you, as well as municipal fines (assuming your guest didn't steal the change, too).

If it looks too good to be true ...

You've heard this before: If it looks too good to be true, it's likely not true. This maxim is particularly applicable when it involves auto insurance. Sometimes, an insurer will give an applicant an amazing premium quote that is significantly lower than what the applicant is currently paying or is being quoted by other insurers. Unfortunately, the quoted and bound premium may not be the final premium. Insurers generally are allowed to complete their underwriting review and revise the billed premium according to the rating elements discovered after the policy was bound. What initially seemed like a great bargain could end up being a big burden.

"Dave" is ready to purchase a vehicle at the local dealership. He calls his insurer to quote the insurance on the new car. The premium will be $3,000 per year, but the current insurer knows Dave's traffic violation record, the drivers in his household and the losses that he's incurred over the last five years. This kind of information is available to all insurers, but they must pay a fee for it.

Dave is reluctant to purchase the car because the car payment, combined with insurance costs, exceeds his budget. The car salesperson doesn't want to lose the sale, so she recommends that Dave call an insurer that she relies upon under these circumstances. This insurer quotes an annual premium in the amount of $1,500. The insurer asks Dave all the right questions, but Dave does not remember the fender bender or the speeding ticket he got two years ago. Nor does this insurer want to pay for the records to verify statements on the application until the policy is bound and the insurer has received the first premium installment. Dave proceeds to purchase the car on the assumption that the car insurance is affordable.

Six weeks later, Dave gets the bad news. Underwriting reports have been obtained by the new insurer, and it turns out the annual premium will be $3,200. As frustrated as Dave is, he probably will stay with that insurer because to return to the prior insurer now will require another down payment, and it will take weeks to get an unearned premium refund from the new insurer.

Shopping for the right price, service and coverage is a wise thing to do. Our agency represents multiple insurers that compete for your business. The difference is that we can ensure that each of these insurers knows the pertinent details about you ahead of binding time so that you don't end up with an underwriting surprise. That not only sounds good, but it's true.

Spring cleaning for your personal insurance

Getting organized and ready for spring feels great. We've got some suggestions for you to think about when you're spring cleaning:

1.) Tune up your auto policy.

Everyone makes sure auto insurance "fits" when they first purchase their policy, but now is a good time to make sure your coverage is appropriate for your present circumstances.

Do you have enough personal injury protection or medical payments coverage? Are you adequately insured for the financial consequences due to injury by an uninsured or underinsured motorist? Got a new driver in the family? Are you getting all the credits available?

2.) Give your homeowners coverage a good polish.

Do you have enough insurance to replace your home if the unthinkable happened?

It's also a good time to update your home inventory (you have a home inventory, right?). Do you have really valuable stuff, like antiques, jewelry or collectibles? Do you need coverage for your toys—a boat, ATV, or other recreational vehicles? Do you have domestic employees or are you running a side business out of your home?

3.) Dust off your life and health insurance.

Are your life insurance beneficiaries updated? Do you need disability income coverage to keep your family intact should you lose the ability to bring home the bacon?

Changes happen in life. Our agency is here to make sure you're covered appropriately as they do, but you need to keep us informed. Put us on your spring cleaning list.
